everyone is a volunteer," Brown said, "and every parent is involved with a committee."

It is not only parents and family members, however, who volunteer their time and efforts, Brown said. There are a numerous people in the community who support the theater even when they don't have family members in the current production, she said. Matt Bolles, for instance, volunteered his services as a musician for this show. Other community volunteers include Phyllis Bedard of Trattoria Simpatico and Tony Gutierrez.

"Somehow everything gets done," Brown said, "and the community makes it happen."

Due to the number of actors involved in the production, several of roles had to be created. This is a fairly common occurrence for the JCT and it makes for a unique production, Kerr said. The play, based on the book of the same name by Louisa May Alcott, follows the tragedies and triumphs of the March sisters. In order to accommodate the additional participants, however, a number of fables written by Alcott have been weaved into the production, Kerr said.

Kerr wrote in the extra parts from the fables, according to Brown. "The way it was worked into the play was by having Jo, the lead character, sit down at her writing desk and begin to talk; the scene then comes to life," Brown said.

A dynamic trio of musicians adds another unique feature to this production according to Kerr and Brown. The live acoustic trio is comprised of musicians Matt Bolles on guitar, and Judy Bolles and Hilary Hartlaub on violin. The group performs lively 19th century dance and folk music throughout the production.

"Little Women" promises to be both a celebration of Jamestown's exceptional community as well as a lively and entertaining production.
